My Story:

If there was a competition, Dean Moulas would be in the running for the firm's most extroverted individual. One co-worker, fairly much of an extrovert himself, likens a conversation with Dean to talking to a fire hose in a good way. At the same time, it's easy to picture Dean as a professor holding forth in a crowded lecture hall. It's less clear what course he would teach, as he's equally at home discussing history, art, economic theory and any number of other subjects. Dean grew up in Dayton, learned to play the sousaphone and went to The Ohio State University, where he joined the marching band.

When he normally leads with, it is a fact that he dotted the "i" in the band's legendary Script Ohio formation, in which the band spells out "Ohio" in high-strutting marching band cursive. The formation is one of the most hallowed traditions in college marching band history. A poster-size photograph of the formation taken from a helicopter on Sept. 20, 1986, the 50th anniversary of the Script Ohio, hangs in Dean's office. He once walked in to a friend's office in a position of learning to fly, he spent four years as a missileer at Minot Air Force Base in North Dakota. He spent a total of 248 days of those four years on missile alert duty. This required him to descend 60 feet below the surface of the earth to a launch control center, Dean and another guy. A steel door would clank shut behind them and there they would stay for 24 hours, watching over hundreds of Minuteman nuclear missiles in silos spread across some 8,000 miles of the Dakota hinterlands. It was a boring job, punctuated intermittently with a collective four-hour shift per hour. A tremendous amount of sensitive equipment at all those silos was used to detect and identify any incoming strike could be interpreted as an electromagnetic pulse. A storm could throw snow on top of a cap to a missile silo and set off alarms. It was a whole lot of noise. You're busting out codebooks. So at the age of 23, I had enormous responsibilities. It was a very strange point in my life. and, to a greater extent, as a missileer in that launch control center, Dean learned how it feels to be part of something so much greater than oneself. From his experience, he learned that sense in my life through my work here. For the vast majority of my clients, I know I am having an enormous impact on their lives, through one and had in sickness and in health. It's a great feeling of fulfillment. He loves what he does, though he often works with so many families. He says it's a great feeling of fulfillment. Only by his love and devotion to his own family – his wife, Catherine, and their three children – but similar in so many ways.
